THE THOMAS HEIDEMANN COLLECTION

WHEN a restless, highly successful art director turns his considerable energies to photography, the result is a unique synthesis of form and substance. Such is the case with Thomas Heidemann, a German-born visionary who, after rising to the top of the advertising industry in Dusseldorf and later Miami, Florida, decided it was time to express his own artistic desires instead of his clients'. The transition was easy. One day Heidemann picked up a Nikon and started shooting. Two months later Playgirl published a fashion spread by Heidemann, shot in Miami. "I started with body shots right away. Being from a fashion background, I found it easy to not care about clothes," says Heidemann, a tall, intense man of 33 who speaks at a rapid-fire pace, tossing out so many ideas and witticisms that one wonders if he is ever able to get a good night's sleep. He is unusually vocal about his own frailties, including his mixed feelings on photographing nudes.

"On the one hand, I say I'm free about photographing the human body. But, some days I look and say, my God, the model is nude. I'm totally prudish; totally full of complexes about everything," he states calmly, perfectly composed, sipping a glass of chilled Pinot Grigio. He is wearing two watches. "People sometimes say my nudes are detached, not sensual. I shoot my models as objects; I know exactly what I want. I don't have a sexual aspect when I shoot."

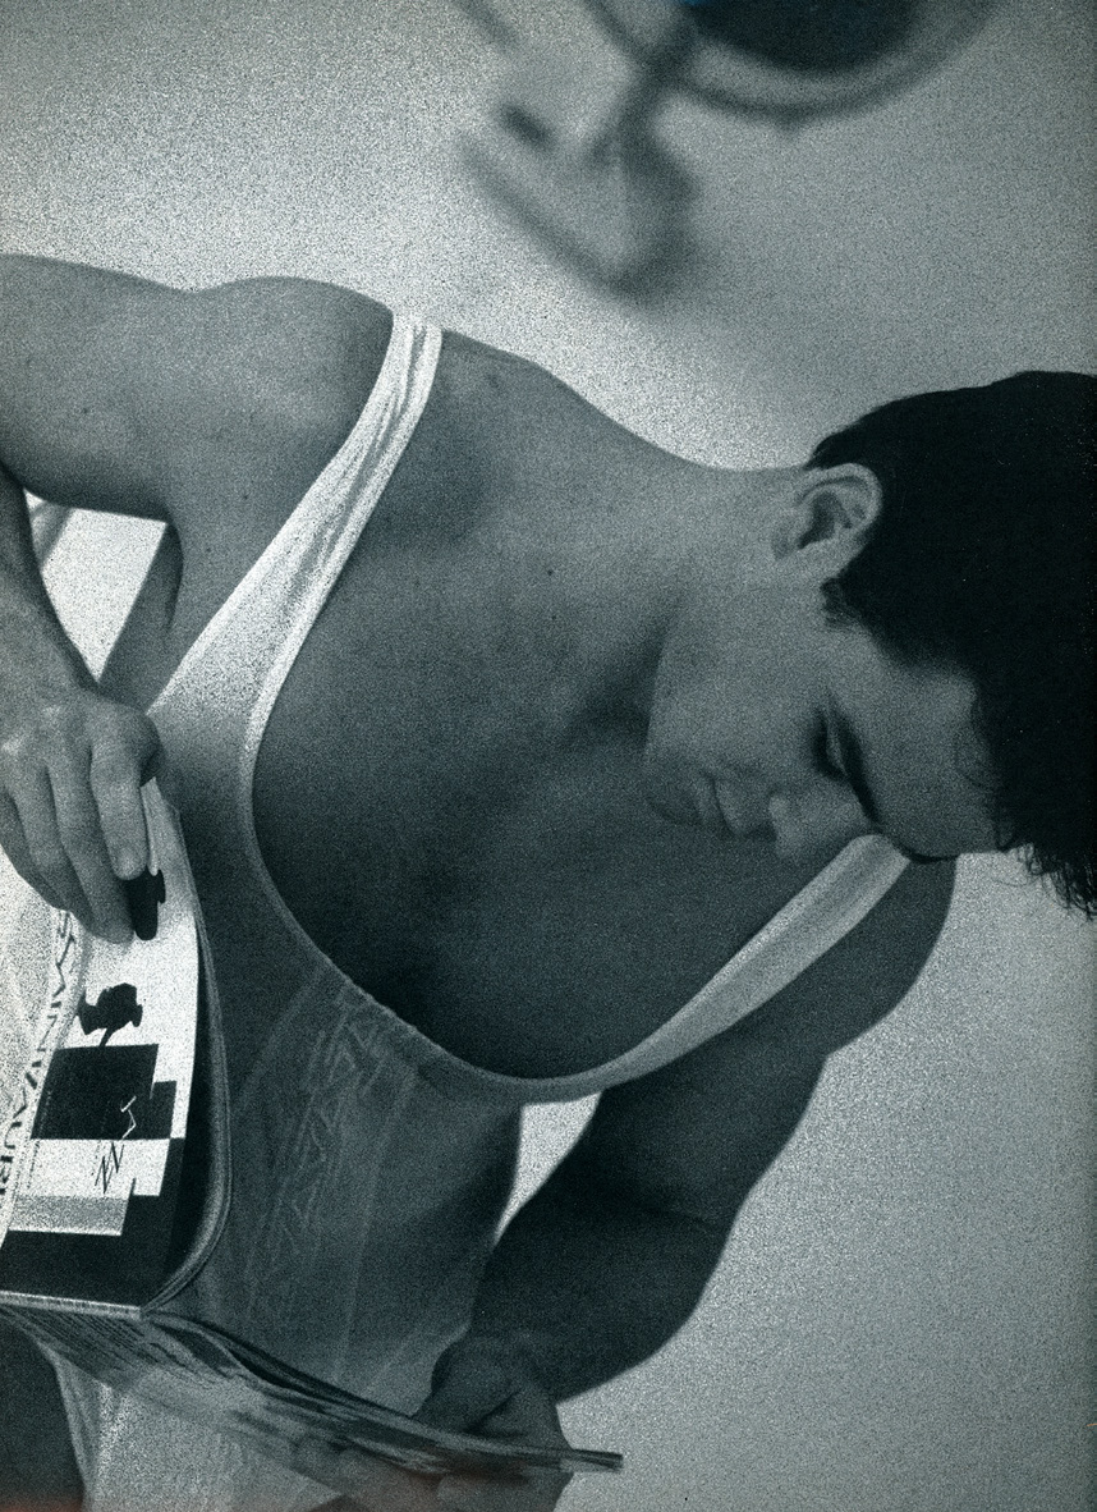

Although Heidemann's nudes do convey a sexual tone, it is an impassioned one. Like their photographer, these nudes are erudite, confident, powerful. It is a seduction that overcomes slowly. "I try to capture that moment when everyone stares, when the beauty is overwhelming."

Today, Heidemann lives in Miami with his wife, Teddi Gunter, who owns a styling and prop shop for the fashion industry. As for Heidemann's future, after conquering photography he will possibly turn his sights to filmmaking. "I would love to do a porno movie with Richard Gere," Heidemann says, smiling. "He is the male Marlene Dietrich. I also would love to work with Don Johnson. He is very '90s."
